Editorial Review

Review

It would be nearly impossible for the average person to recreate a Rafael Araujo drawing. The Venezuelan artist's work is exacting in the most literal sense. The good news is, you'll never have to. He's done the work for you. --Wired Magazine

For years, Venezuelan artist Rafael Araujo has been the undisputed master of golden-ratio art, meticulously hand-illustrating examples of the Fibonacci spiral a geometric curlicue based upon a sequence of integers which describes the way things tend to grow in the natural world without using a computer. His style lies somewhere between da Vinci's Renaissance fascination with nature, and the geometrical patterns of Escher at his best. --Fast Company Design

A book for colouring fanatics and math nerds. Clearly, a killer combination. --Mashable

About the Author

Rafael Araujo is an architect and illustrator from Caracas, Venezuela. For over 40 years he has been drawing beautiful illustrations of nature, entirely by hand. At an old drafting table he adeptly renders the mathematical brilliance of nature with just a pencil, compass, ruler and protractor. Rafael applies the Golden Ratio to his geometric formulas and leaves the construction lines intact to highlight this natural mathematical framework. Rafael has been featured on CNN and in publications such as Wired, Fast Company, Mashable, My Modern Met, and WWF's magazine. His illustrations have been shown at Stanford University and in major exhibitions and galleries around the world. More than 30,000 people follow his work at fb.com/rafaelaraujoart.
